

Tempus fugit, memento mori by Tony Dawson in the February 8, 2011 issue

The second hand seemed to tremble on the edge of motion when I was young, like a diver poised with suppliant arms, paused in momentary stillness before secretly shifting his weight forward, opening to the instant gravity and air. But after half a century my seconds and minutes are long forgotten casualties, and weeks months years disappear like pressed flowers crushed by fingers no longer precise and nimble. And yet behind my back each day still stretches feline in the brightness of my memory, bee-song somnolent without eagerness for the moment around the corner. And when night arrives, curtained and padded or hard like a crucifix, nubilous as obsidian or moonlight-silver,

I will stand trembling on its edge with suppliant arms and just enough time for one last dive.
