Listen

by Paul Willis in the August 7, 2013 issue

A lake lies all alone in its own shape. It's not going anywhere.

A lake can wait a long time for a hiker to come and camp on its shore.

It will reflect the moonlight, give him a drink of pale silver.

Toward dawn, the wind might ruffle it a little, and the water will have words with the granite.

Once the hiker goes away through October meadows, the lake will sparkle by itself. You'll never see it. There is so much you will never see.