Common elegance

by Samuel Harrison in the October 1, 2014 issue

Kneeling, he turned the fish by their tails on the iron grate; their skins sticking and burning.

The fire died once
and he bent and blew

on the embers, holding his robe at the throat, a gesture of such common elegance the gates flew open.

A ribbon of dawn
lay taut and pink on the sea.

When at last he raised his head and looked at me, I shivered. Simon, son of John, do you love me?