Sunday morning

by Mark Jones in the October 1, 2014 issue

Standing at the window,
I let fall a book of American sermons

when I see my neighbor washing his Honda in the June sunshine and across the street, an old woman catechizing her roses.

On the radio a disk jockey affirms his faith in Virgin Records, though he himself is a separatist who mostly worships at independent shrines.

I switch stations to hear a scholar trying to describe the color purple:

it cannot be done, he finally admits, though he calls it the existential center.

Carrying flatbread and coffee, I abandon the house for the sidewalk, where a block away two kids are playing with a garden sprinkler.

They dance in rainbows, free, it seems, of all catastrophe.
