

The still pilgrim's thoughts upon rising by Angela Alaimo O'Donnell in the December 23, 2015 issue

Blessed sleep and the long call of light.

The morning a mercy of birds.

Returned from the black hole of being,
she finds all as she left it last night.

The chairs askew, the table crumbs, the dishes stacked up in the sink.

Yesterday's dress tossed across the bed.

It's enough to make her think of how the world just waits for us attending to its nightly song, of how we breathe in time with it and rise again with each new dawn, of how we bear the miracle and find ourselves where we belong.