Brancacci Chapel

by Janie McCrary in the April 13, 2016 issue

Young Masaccio died before his paint had dried, but his time-battered fresco tells all: how man in the midst of figs and wine reaches for the whole banquet and loses all but the crumbs, which taste like poison.

Their sin is fresh; the doors of Paradise slam while heel still crosses the threshold, driven out by the upraised sword of a crimson-winged messenger of God who points their way to a world of dust. His flowing garment billows around their nakedness.

They walk toward us, look like us.
His woe is inward, head bowed.
His hands cover darkened eyes;
from his mouth, muffled sobs.
Yet he strides forward
to face the wilderness
which yet he does not comprehend.

She does. Her foreshortened face, skull-like, gazes up into the looming abyss.
Eyes strokes of gloom,
from her mouth a scream of agony
for what she sees ahead:
needles passing in dirty rooms,
children shrunk to skeletons,

men strapped with bombs.