At the Y

by Mary M. Brown in the August 31, 2016 issue

Iris, at 92, is more bird than flower, more wings flapping than bloom unfolding. She is not still life, not slow motion, but mid-flight and atwitter, elbows and knees in awkward poses, fragile neck gawked in the lovely way of a small crane or a young duck.

Only her lavender pants suggest a plant, a blossom of early spring—oh, and the way she looks toward the sun, stretches as our instructor tells her to, her back a tender stalk.
