

Campus giveaway is in hands of foundation

by G. Jeffrey MacDonald in the February 20, 2013 issue

Christian institutions hoping to win a free campus in western Massachusetts might soon face competition from others who are willing to pay for it, according to terms of a year-end donation from the property's billionaire owners.

Hobby Lobby Stores on December 28 donated a 217-acre campus in Northfield, Massachusetts, to the National Christian Foundation, a Georgia-based charity that administers donor-advised funds.

NCF now plans to do what Hobby Lobby has tried in vain to do since acquiring the property in 2009: give it to a Christian institution that will honor the legacy of its founder, 19th-century evangelist Dwight L. Moody.

"We're committed to maintaining the spirit with which the campus was founded," said Aimee Minnich, president of NCF's office in Olathe, Kansas, in an e-mail. "So our first intent would be to find an educational institution as the final owner of the property."

NCF received no requirements from Oklahoma's Green family, which owns the Hobby Lobby craft stores chain, according to Hobby Lobby real estate analyst Les Miller. Although the Greens have long hoped someone would get the campus free of charge, it's now possible that NCF could sell it.

"Our intent is to find a permanent owner for the property and turn it over to them, either by sale, or by donation, or by some combination of those two," said NCF spokesman Steve Chapman.

The gift to NCF marks the latest chapter in a saga that began just over three years ago, when Northfield Mount Hermon School consolidated onto one campus and sold its 43-building Northfield campus to Hobby Lobby for $100,000. The Green family poured $5 million into repairs and renovations with hopes of seeing a new C. S. Lewis College operating on the site by 2012.

But finding a recipient with sufficient means to run the facilities has proven difficult. The California-based C. S. Lewis Foundation fell short of fund-raising targets to launch a college on the site. An eight-month search process turned up a new recipient, Arizona's for-profit Grand Canyon University, in September, but GCU pulled out when projected costs for maintenance and upgrades climbed from $150 million to more than $180 million.

By giving the real estate to NCF, the Greens remain involved and may make recommendations on who ultimately receives the property. They also receive new benefits, notably a big 2012 tax write-off for the fair-market value of the Northfield campus. Hobby Lobby declined to comment on the campus's appraised value.

Giving the property to NCF seems to help Hobby Lobby pursue its original goal for the property, observers say, while lightening burdens associated with doing so.

"It was a smart move for Hobby Lobby to give it to the foundation," said Lisa Featherngill, managing director of planning for Abbot Downing, a Wells Fargo company that advises ultra-high-net-worth families. "They can leverage the foundation's network of charities [to find a recipient], they can get the write-off . . . and they don't have to be as involved in the transaction as they have been" up to this point.

If NCF is unable to give or sell the campus to an educational institution, the new arrangement allows for additional options. —RNS

This article was edited Feb. 19, 2013.