On the first anniversary of my father's death by Charles Hughes in the March 11, 2020 issue

Rain, early March rain Heaving against the windows; March storms in again,

All bluster, as though Intending to remind me Of something I know:

As spring will appear Behind this sorry weather, So grief, this past year,

Has stayed coy, low-key
But now seems poised to flower,
Be what it should be—

Or at least regret For things we couldn't settle, Forgive, or forget.
