Angels everywhere

by Luci Shaw in the December 2, 2020 issue

Some days I notice angels everywhere light glancing through windows, flying through stained glass as if through air.

A human ear shaped like a wing, curiously curving to admit a flare of sound, tells me of angels listening to my listening, even as I sing.

What is that vagrant cloud, that glistening?
Often in the blue of heaven a trail of light from a plane to me appears as a heavenly body playing there beyond my grasping. Or, at night, the taillight of a truck sends a red spark like some twinkly being in the dark trailing her glory robe in sight of stationary sightseers. Yesterday, morning light and over the marsh a winged flight, another view—Gabriel, or a Great Blue?

But often, nightly, through the skylight stars multiply like silver sand. And near to far I link myself again with, Oh—there! One bright, angelic, particular star.
