By the oaks of Mamre

by Bonnie Thurston in the October 20, 2021 issue

He had been a stranger, so took in strangers, today three, and in the heat of the day. He interrupts my spinning wool for his new cloak. orders me to make a fire, use my best meal to make cakes for heaven's sake, tells the servant boy to slaughter that calf I've had my eye on. Of course I listened behind our tent's flap. How else do we women learn anything important? How peculiar of them to speak of a son to such as we are. such as I am who no longer swells and empties, with whom Abraham no longer sleeps, nor could mange if he did. His Lord, who does not even speak directly to me, questions my laughing? I should weep or howl, but have no time or energy, must clean up after their feast, from which, perhaps, they left me cake crumbs, a bit of meat on a bone, a practicable promise.
