The church's one foundation

by Bonnie Thurston in the July 13, 2022 issue

Unable to see verdant forests for mangled, ecclesial trees, most of my companions have abandoned the church, not rats, but certainly escapees from a rusty old ship, with a treasure in her hold undiminished by its often ugly, always precarious, commanders.

To the sailors who remain, not confident, but at least hopeful she isn't going down, who still stoke old boilers, and swab slimy decks, St. Benedict offers counsel: Be prudent in your cleaning. In scraping off the rust, don't break the fragile vessel.

Appreciating mature beauty, long faithful seaworthiness, old sailors, like astrolabes, still chart direction by the stars. Their night watches taught them the sun will rise from the sea. They show their shipmates how to be held in a crumbling conveyance by the foundling Love in her hold.

* * * * * *

Jon Mathieu, the Christian Century's community engagement editor, joined Bonnie Thurston in conversation about her poem.