Anatomy of seduction

by Mary M. Brown in the April 22, 2008 issue it turns out

the allure of hummingbirds has little to do

with their own rouge—
instead, the thrilling iridescence of their wings depends

upon the distance

between the ridges of their feathers, dulling structures my guess we'd ignore, were it not for some blessed interplay with incident light