

Visiting hours

by Paul Willis in the August 26, 2008 issue

A friend of theirs had been festering like an old sandwich, rotting a little before disposal. They had to come, but it got to where they held their breath before they stepped inside the room.
The wife remembered how anything with mayonnaise had to be refrigerated.

Even a sack lunch in an office was suspect if stored under the desk for a morning:
egg salad was the worst.
The husband recalled a tiny door in the stone wall of an English church, stage right from the modest altar—a place for lepers to take communion. Only part of a soul could pass, and precious little of the smell. The wife and husband talked with their old friend like this, backing off from his suppurations, unwilling to think, This is our body, unwilling to think, Dust to dust, slipping their elements of decay into the outer cold and darkness.