

Horatian salutation

by Brett Foster in the January 12, 2010 issue

Reader, here is no know-nothing muddle-mouth grinning till his time's up, nor this month's charismatic hotshot—let's be glad for that.

Nor is it time for deeper, troubled things, the heaviness of swollen hands that knit our sweaters or underfed teenagers who look like my six year old, sweet in his warm bed.

Shall I go on, then, or end it?

It's not even an occasion for lyrical greatness (who can bear or hear it?), or honoring the slain and scars of veterans

 (how to sustain it?) or excursions on hermeneutical wings along the Word.

Or less estimable, more complicated forms of happiness:

breathless days when we became better than ourselves,

 as if awaking from a dream.

Let other songs bless or curse with big decibels.

I leave this business, such as it is,

to higher-minded poets or tireless annalists.

I sing simply of Love, of grace, and those graces who are your friends, warm with life and giving you grief, playfully—these late evenings in December.

And I sing of such beautiful people, even closer, safe and asleep nearby, here and there, her and her and him, so pleasing and peace be with them, and you too, Reader, you too.
