Under cover

by Luci Shaw in the May 30, 2012 issue

We see God in the shape he shows to us. For some, fire. For others, holy smoke, oil, a running river, sheep's crook, muscular right arm that holds against the dark, the dread.

It is the oddity of poets to not see the world straight on but at some slant, under the skin, behind the scrim—a scurry of leaves, clouds. God speaks his presence in the wind.

I sensed him even in the ink warming within the pen before these words arrived.