Sea of Galilee: Aerial view

by Marci Rae Johnson in the May 29, 2013 issue

From a satellite the Sea of Galilee looks like my heart, but dark. Jesus walked beside it one day. He said, "come I will return the blood to the empty space." They say dark matter makes up most of this place, which neither emits, nor absorbs light. From this height the green moss around the sea masks the fact of mostly desert. The mountains to the east must be my lungs. I breathe in the nothing that is actually everything. Moss from the sea, full of fish and leaves and other debris might make its way to me on the jet stream anchor itself in my esophagus. Jesus told me to fish in this sea. Cast my net, take up my boat, because I might bring someone up out of the water. Someone to fill my heart with fish and sand. Blood and bark.
