Advent

by Donna Pucciani in the November 27, 2013 issue

Hands can catch water from a stream for drinking or the gathering of stones, or the feel of something cold, pure, elemental.

Grasping the dark is harder.

Winter's rough air slips through outstretched fingers.

Unembraceable night fills with wisps of wanting,

thoughts of old lovers, the dead and dying, falling through space.

Our open palms hold only lamentations. We await the promise of fire, receive only darkness,

and bow under it, bow to it, the unseen star.