Petrichor

by Kathleen Brewin Lewis in the December 9, 2015 issue

Two geologists made this word from the Greek, petros for stone, and ichor, for the liquid that flows through the veins of the gods. They wanted to name the scent of parched earth after fresh rain: The reconstituted redolence of salted silt marbled with terracotta. This old, dry world brought back to loamy life—another name for mercy.
