

The still pilgrim revisits the British Museum for the first time in twenty years by Angela Alaimo O'Donnell in the September 14, 2016 issue

When old age shall this generation waste, Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe.
—Keats, “Ode on a Grecian Urn”

We know these columns, this pediment, angels and sages serene as stone stand at attention, embodiment of past grandeur, for this we've come, to see the marble men and maids, the attic shape, the heifer's march, the ancient truth that met Keats' gaze and fired his poems that light the dark knowledge of our mortal being, sing the song of fleeting time, the static creatures we are seeing live and breathe in his sweet lines.

The poem endures, though Keats is dust.
All remains unchanged but us.