

Churches cheer agreement on reducing weapons: START treaty

When President Obama and Russian president Dmitry Medvedev met in Prague on April 8 to sign a new agreement on nuclear weapons, it marked one more step in the religious community's long campaign to reduce, if not end, the threat of nuclear war.

The Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty, or START, aims to reduce each country's deployed strategic warheads to about 1,550 each and cut the number of launchers from the currently permitted 1,600 to 800. It would also cap the number of nuclear-armed missiles and bombers.

For Christian denominations both at home and abroad, the pact represents a major victory in a campaign that has waxed and waned since the first atomic bombs were dropped at the end of World War II.

On August 20, 1945, just days after the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Protestant leaders issued a statement expressing their "unmitigated condemnation" of the attacks. Less than a year later, a commission that included theologians Reinhold Niebuhr and John C. Bennett issued a full-bodied report that declared, "We have sinned grievously against the laws of God" in using nuclear weapons.

But as David Cortright, director of policy studies at the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame, has noted, an ambivalence marked Christians' responses to the bomb over time.

"As the Cold War intensified in the late 1940s, some of those who had greeted the bomb with horror now came to accept it as a necessary deterrent against godless communism and the perceived threat of totalitarian aggression," he wrote in the Spring 2009 issue of Yale Divinity School's journal Reflections.

The 1980s, however, saw a resurgence of religious and secular antinuclear campaigns, including the Catholic bishops' 1983 pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace" and organizing by the evangelical social justice group Sojourners. The National Association of Evangelicals joined the push later in the 1980s.

More recently, the so-called new evangelicals have organized the Two Futures Project, a movement that calls for the abolition of all nuclear weapons.

The Catholic bishops' 1983 letter put the nation's largest religious community squarely in the midst of the public debate over the Reagan administration's nuclear arms policies. The bishops endorsed a "no-first-use" declaration by the U.S. and voiced support for a comprehensive test ban treaty, both of which continue to be sticky issues in arms control debates. But they supported continuing the policy of deterrence, even while making their approval "strictly conditional" and "a step on the way to progressive disarmament."

Protestant denominations in the U.S. and international bodies such as the World Council of Churches, however, pushed beyond the Catholic bishops to hold up an abolitionist vision of a world without nuclear weapons.

In 1986, United Methodist bishops published their own pastoral statement, "In Defense of Creation," which forthrightly rejected deterrence and said the doctrine "must no longer receive the church's blessing." Presbyterians also have a long history of opposition to the nuclear arms race, stretching back to 1946.

On the international level, both the WCC and the Vatican, under a succession of popes, have been outspoken opponents of the arms race and any use of nuclear weapons. Pope John Paul II edged the Catholic Church close to pacifism, declaring that there are almost no conditions in a nuclear age that justify nations going to war with each other.

It is a vision the churches keep before them. "The moral end is clear: a world free of the threat of nuclear weapons," Archbishop Edwin O'Brien of Baltimore told the Global Zero Summit in February.

A proponent of nuclear disarmament since his days in the Senate, Obama quickly made the issue of nuclear disarmament a central piece of his administration's foreign policy.

His return to Prague marked the one-year anniversary of a speech he gave in the Czech capital in which he stated "clearly and with conviction America's commitment to seek the peace and security of a world without nuclear weapons." Obama insisted that he was not being naive, acknowledging that his vision “will not be reached quickly—perhaps not in my lifetime.”

The difficulties presented by both international diplomacy and domestic political realities are not likely to wither in the face of either Obama’s rhetoric or the churches’ longtime activism.

Senate approval of the new START treaty is not guaranteed, especially in the fractious and partisan atmosphere of Washington.

Within days after the START signing in Prague, a global nuclear security summit was planned to bring 44 nations together in Washington.

At the same time, the administration’s Nuclear Posture Review was expected to be sent to Congress soon. It is likely to spark heated debate if it includes aspects of Obama’s aspirations to include a declaration of “no-first-use” of nuclear weapons against nonnuclear states. —David Anderson, Religion News Service
