

Supreme Court tosses case of 'Christian candy cane'

by Chris Lisee in the July 11, 2012 issue

An appeal over Christmas sweets turned bitter in June when the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear the so-called "Christian candy cane" case. The case from Texas has become a rallying point for conservative Christians concerned about free religious expression in public schools and students' ability to distribute religious literature.

The case, Morgan v. Swanson, kicked off nine years ago in the Plano Independent School District when principals prevented self-described evangelical students from distributing religious literature on school grounds.

In one instance, principal Lynn Swanson stopped third-grader Jonathan Morgan from distributing a Christian-themed bookmark at a winter break party. The boy wanted to hand out candy cane-shaped pens along with a card purporting to explain the holiday treat's Christian roots.

The card read in part: "So, every time you see a candy cane, remember the message of the candy maker: Jesus is the Christ!"

In another instance, principal Jackie Bomchill prevented second-grader Stephanie Versher from passing out Passion play tickets and pencils with the message, "Jesus loves me, this I know, for the Bible tells me so" on school grounds.

Last year, the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found the principals were within their rights in stopping the candy canes but also found restrictions on student speech unconstitutional.

The principals were exempt under "qualified immunity," which protects government officials from violating a law that is not "clearly established."

The Supreme Court's decision not to intervene means that ruling stands.

Hiram Sasser, who represented the families on behalf of the Texas-based Liberty Institute law firm, was disappointed in the latest decision.

“We were hoping to finally put this issue to rest: that government school officials should be held accountable when they violate the law and students’ First Amendment rights. No student should be subjected to religious discrimination by the government,” he said in a press release.

Dallas attorney Tom Brandt, who represented the two principals, said the case was never about First Amendment speech but rather protection for teachers. “Educators must be allowed to make decisions that are in the best interest of an entire school without fear of individual retribution when the law is unclear,” he said.

While the educators’ immunity question is settled, other parts of the case continue to work their way through the district and circuit court levels, and Sasser said there’s still a possibility to win on students’ rights.

“I’m concerned that some government school officials received the wrong message, which is that if they violate the law, no court is going to hold them accountable,” Sasser said in a telephone interview. “Hopefully the message is that from now on, government officials (teachers) will be held accountable.” —RNS