

Christians torn about legal marijuana

by Sarah Pulliam Bailey in the March 5, 2014 issue

This year's Super Bowl was dubbed by some as the "pot bowl," as the Denver Broncos and Seattle Seahawks hail from the two states where fans will soon be able to get marijuana as easily as they can get pizza.

As surveys show a shift in support for legalized marijuana, religious opinion-makers are struggling over the idea of legislating morality by putting those who sell or use marijuana into prisons overcrowded with hard-core criminals.

According to a 2013 survey from the Public Religion Research Institute, 58 percent of white mainline Protestants and 54 percent of black Protestants favor legalizing the use of marijuana. On the other side, nearly seven in ten (69 percent) of white evangelical Protestants oppose it.

Catholics appear to be the most evenly divided group, with 48 percent favoring legalization and 50 percent opposing it.

Caught in the middle of the debate are pastors, theologians, and other religious leaders torn over how to uphold traditional understandings of sin and morality in a rapidly changing tide of public opinion.

Mark DeMoss, a spokesman for several prominent evangelicals, including Franklin Graham and Hobby Lobby founder Steve Green, admits he takes a view that might not be held by most Christian leaders.

"When 50 percent of our prison beds are occupied by nonviolent offenders, we have prison overcrowding problems, and violent offenders [are] serving shortened sentences, I have a problem with incarceration for possession of marijuana," he said. "None of that's to say I favor free and rampant marijuana use. I don't think it's the most serious blight on America."

Alcohol abuse, he said, is a much more serious issue. President Obama suggested something similar to the New Yorker recently when he said that marijuana is less dangerous than alcohol.

But don't expect pastors to start preaching in line with DeMoss, who said he has not seen much comment from religious leaders on the issue.

"If a pastor said some of what I said, there would be some who would feel the pastor was compromising on a moral issue," he said. "No one wants to risk looking like they're in favor of marijuana. I'm not in favor, but I think we should address how high of a priority it should be."

Both Colorado and Washington State approved the recreational use of marijuana by adults in the 2012 elections. Even Texas governor Rick Perry, who found early support among some evangelicals during the 2012 presidential race, has come out supporting the decriminalization of marijuana.

Laws on marijuana have disproportionately affected minorities, said Samuel Rodriguez, president of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference. "There are community programs that can better engage young people than incarceration," he said. "Many black and brown lives are destroyed because of incarceration."

A majority of Americans now favor legalizing the use of marijuana, according to the most recent polling from the Pew Research Center. In 2013, 52 percent said that the use of marijuana should be made legal while 45 percent said it should not. Among millennials (adults born after 1980) 65 percent favor legalizing marijuana use, up from just 36 percent in 2008.

Most Christians are still reluctant to favor legalization, Rodriguez said, since the effects of marijuana aren't much different from getting drunk, which is a biblical no-no. "It has the ability of diluting reason, behavior, putting your guard down," he said. "We are temples of God's Holy Spirit, and it has the ability of hindering a clear thought process."

Some who favor legalized marijuana liken the Christians who oppose it to the early 20th-century evangelicals and fundamentalists who supported a federal prohibition on alcohol.

Part of a move in the Republican Party toward a loosening of marijuana regulation could be coming from people who also would sympathize with the Tea Party, said Russell Moore, head of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission.

“I definitely think there’s been a coalition of ‘leave us alone’ libertarians and Woodstock Nation progressives on this issue of marijuana,” Moore said. “I do think there has been an effort to stigmatize those with concerns as Carrie Nations holding on to Prohibition.”

By executive order of Governor Andrew Cuomo, New York has joined a growing group of states that have loosened restrictions on marijuana, planning to allow limited use of the drug by those with serious illnesses. Some leaders, including Focus on the Family’s Jim Daly, have suggested there are medical benefits but do not condone recreational use of marijuana.

Nine states and the District of Columbia have introduced legislation to legalize recreational marijuana use by adults, according to the Daily Beast. Twenty states have passed legislation to allow medical marijuana since 1996, while 16 states have begun to allow the possession of small amounts of marijuana.

But Moore said the analogy between alcohol and marijuana laws don’t hold up. “Alcohol already had a ubiquitous presence in American society long before Prohibition, in ways marijuana has not,” he said, also suggesting he could find support for some medical marijuana.

“If there were studies demonstrating marijuana is the best treatment for a particular disease and the prescription was tightly regulated the way we do morphine and other mind-altering drugs, yes. That’s not what we have happening in America right now.” —RNS

This article was edited Feb. 17, 2014.