

On not growing in faith and knowledge

In recent conversations with my seminary classmates, we've been lamenting the state of Christian education. In many churches it is evident that the average member hasn't grown in religious or biblical knowledge since he or she heard moralistic tales of Noah, Esther or Daniel as a child. Some even resist pastoral attempts to expand their Christian knowledge, and they simply refuse to learn about other religions. As seminarians, we are struggling with how to respond to this.

It's a significant problem because it affects not only the faith of the communal body of Christ but also how we live in a pluralistic society. Religious identity matters, now more than ever. Our globalized age has seen increased secularization and indifference to the particularities of religion-but this doesn't lead to a society where religion doesn't matter. It leads to misunderstanding about the other, with sometimes dire consequences.

A poor understanding of our religious self fails both the body of Christ and the needs of our global society. For society to be healthy we must do the hard work of understanding ourselves as religious creatures as well as opening ourselves up to learning about the religious other. I appreciate this comment from Tom Greggs:

Far from being a distant (and perhaps unimportant) figure, the religious other has become in recent times a real person who affects the communities and the world to which each of us belong.

We are interconnected with people of all religions whether we like it or not. A lack of understanding places us in a position of judgment of other faith systems' validity. It also fuels the paranoia of fundamentalist factions within them. When the interconnected world asserts that fundamentalists' faith is too irrelevant to be understood, this confirms their worst fears--and fear can spur violent reaction.

Living in a pluralistic world requires respect, which in turn requires knowledge and understanding. The question for current and future clergy is this: how can we initiate and shepherd this process in our churches?
