Promise keepers

By Steve Thorngate January 20, 2011

Yesterday, House Republicans passed a bill that, if enacted, would repeal last year's health-care reform bill. It won't be enacted; it'll never get past the Senate or the president. But the GOP took the House back in part because of its promises to repeal reform, so a symbolic effort was required.

While the bill is called the "Repealing the Job-Killing Health Care Law Act," the Republicans were sensitive enough to change "killing" to  when discussing the bill in the wake of the Tucson shooting. Now that's some visionary leadership--or rather, was. On the House floor yesterday, various GOP members spoke about how health-care reform increases the deficit, raises taxes and cuts benefits. If anyone can make heads or tails of that formula, please let me know.

Democratic rhetoric hasn't been universally civil and serious-minded, either. But by and large, reform supporters have effectively seized the opportunity for a second chance at communicating their case to the public. This post by Suzy Khimm highlights the millions of Americans whose health-care situation has been improved by the provisions of reform already in effect, while this fact sheet from the Center on Budget addresses a number of false claims made by proponents of repeal.

Health-care reform will survive this episode of political theater; it may even benefit from it. But that won't be the end--as Jonathan Cohnargues, the real challenge may well come from the Supreme Court.
