

Whose religious freedom?

By Steve Thorngate

March 9, 2012

Michele Chabin reports that Israeli postal workers are refusing to deliver Hebrew-language New Testaments. Mark Silk asks an interesting question:

Let's suppose that thousands of American postal workers similarly refuse to deliver English copies of the Koran mailed by a Muslim organization to hundreds of thousands of American households in hopes of making converts. Whose religious liberty rights should prevail--the senders of the material exercising their own Islamic Great Commission? Or the postal workers who contend that participating in such an exercise would violate their religious beliefs?