"These are not the same."

By Steve Thorngate June 14, 2012

Lots of folks have had tons to say about Mark Regnerus's new study finding that children whose parents have had same-sex relationships fare worse than those reared in "stable, biologically-intact mom-and-pop families." Rob Tisinai sums it up concisely:

The study compares the children of married biological parents with those from broken homes — and the study's "lesbian mothers" that our opponents are vilifying generally weren't married to each other; nor were the gay fathers. No, they were often in opposite-sex relationships that broke down.

Our opponents' reporting hasn't focused on that. But I can easily imagine how how an unstable, dishonest mom/dad relationship would (a) be harmful to the kids, and (b) have nothing to do with same-sex parenting!

Tisinai also offers this helpful diagram, for reference next time a study like this comes out:

