Monday digest

July 30, 2012

Subscribe by RSS feed: magazine, blogs, news. See all feeds.

New today from the Century:

- Carol Zaleski on doing theology face down: "Rites that include prostration make a striking impression. It's not often that one sees a fellow human in an act of total self-surrender."
- Thomas Kidd reviews Michael McClymond and Gerald McDermott, whose "remarkable book will undoubtedly become the standard scholarly introduction to Jonathan Edwards's theology." (subscription required)
- Joshua Carney blogs the lectionary: "The psalms are poignant. They bear emotion in a way that grabs our souls. But I falter when I try to preach them."

In the news:

- Religious roots of trees branch into many faiths
- Catholic priest suggests Satan made James Holmes a killer
- What was Romney like as a Mormon bishop?
- Bible museum closes $50 million deal for D.C. spot
- Religion playing strong role in background of Olympic Games