Still life

by Greg Huteson in the December 7, 2016 issue

There was a shallow moss gray basin set with bunches of grapes.

The grapes were chiseled green with the ripeness of their September harvest. There was a pert glazed pitcher, black as obsidian, filled with cold water. There were six linen napkins with red diagonal strips laxly laid by earthenware plates.

But no one sat at the low walnut table. There was no shepherd or mastiff nearby. No, Old Pritchard's family—bless them!— was casting about somewhere below for his lean body, his cracked bones.