California ginkgos

by Debra Rienstra in the January 18, 2017 issue

The palms on Allen Avenue never condescend to throw out a low branch for perching birds or shade the muscled workers trimming hedges, skimming edgers along lush San Marino lawns.

Aligned in stately colonnades, the palms keep nothing but complacence in their tasseled heads even in November, when the scruffy ginkgos beneath, weary of the California sun, have the good sense to let their leaves, fanned like a thousand open hands, turn yellow and drop to the ground in rough blankets of courage, messy assertions of the need, now and then, to die.
