Worm under the sun

by Charles Hughes in the January 18, 2017 issue

A nightcrawler has found itself marooned, Surrounded unexpectedly by sidewalk. Night rain caused it to move (as earthworms do) Up to the surface, then across slick grass, Picking up speed—until the surface changed From slick, wet grass to concrete, where it stopped. Now, in a clearing sky, the sun keeps climbing. Worms breathe through skin that must stay moist to breathe.

What kind of world plays pointless tricks like this? A worm won't ask; nor will it formulate Hopes likely nothing but more vanities. This worm will be a worm and simply wait.

Most people marching toward the day don't notice. The ones who do—their time is worth too much To spend saving a worm. Some child might try, If only the right child would happen by.
