Ashes

by Paul Martin in the March 1, 2017 issue

The palms we raised in celebration burned to ashes, moistened with oil. Death's greasy stain on our foreheads, not easy to brush off.

When my barber combs the hair off my forehead, she stiffens, and talk about the bright day strains to recover the easy way between us.

Without the body to kneel before, to cry over and touch, we feel awkward rows of chairs facing a polished urn on a pedestal.

Before I start the new fire, I shovel out the cold ashes and scatter them over the vegetable garden, a white dust the wind drives back into my eyes and mouth.
