Beyond doubt

"Truth!" said Pilate. "What does that mean?" —John 18:38

The minute the preacher named it, I knew: Thomas was a hero, not the foil. It took guts for him to offer his hand to Jesus' slit side, to poke his fingers into the nail holes. And besides, he was the honest one: What do you mean, you saw him? Logical to ask his brothers still cowering behind locked doors. And how come Mary Magdalen never earns a Sunday solo—her moment of truth, recognition, in the Easter garden, her witness buried like the lost coin, in the mid-week lectionary days after we celebrate the Resurrection she proclaimed. In truth, she and Thomas should be our guides: wail that grief out in some public place, question if you doubt, but bloody your hands in the world wounds for Christ's sake do what it takes to find your way.
