Testimony

by Luci Shaw in the January 3, 2018 issue

Though my hearing is never acute enough to detect the soft script of the fly's footfalls as it dances on the window, and cleans its wings with its hind legs, the glass knows. The air records it in a single instant, irreversible.

Like my mother's voice when she spoke harshly. The whisper of small roughage, and only crumbs left on the table between us.