

Being so wild, how can anyone hold her?

by Jeanne Murray Walker in the January 31, 2018 issue

This morning, early, a hummingbird flutters beside the hibiscus, untamed as your daughter's infant daughter

now sleeping restlessly in her crib, her breath softly creaking, like the Boston rocker where you sit watching her,

 a new form of prayer.

 Opening her eyes, what does she see?

 You, but unfocused as a strange blue river pouring around her, now raising her up, your scent encircling her, she finds she can swim in your voice which hums the old hymn she has awakened in you

 so she calms and releases herself slowly and you begin to understand: to keep a hummingbird in your hand, you must hold her firmly so she doesn't panic, lightly, lightly so she can breathe.
