

The changed landscape

by Sarah Carey in the May 9, 2018 issue

I wipe dust from your frame. Soon, colleagues stop by my office, talk over your head. When they leave, I turn back to you, notice the magnolia tree behind you is flowering in this chilled building, in this old shot, in that moment never again to be anticipated, with you smiling at me in your felt fedora, knotted necktie, tan trench coat.

After you died, I covered you in glass, backed and shaped your prints to protect you from the elements.

When I learn the magnolia's Chinese ancestors programmed it to bloom in the cold, the scene unfolds with a fresh perspective: snow by blossom, sunshine, stomata, Asia by way of Decatur, now by then, breathing in the past to breathe again.
