

To the Quaker statue in Fairmount Park

by Angela Bilger in the August 1, 2018 issue

Forgive me, Toleration. Your name is spare and taut.

Yours is no stance of abundance, but today your ideal seems barely achievable.

Send me a tightrope across this ravine

so that I may toe my way over to you.

I walk to where the water pools, slowed by a bend in the Wissahickon's path. The surface shows me an upside-down world where bare branches reach infinitely root-ward toward the blue center of earth.

I do not believe in any monstrous god whose will our predicaments are said to be.

I believe in the reality of rock

(call it divine presence, despite our depravity)

where pioneer plants eat at the schist creating conditions for new life.

Create in me a stilled creek where just below the surface, currents pulse with inevitable movement toward open sea, eventually.