

NOW,

by Peter Cooley in the January 30, 2019 issue after a first moment in eternity

I turn around. I'm back in my backyard, the weeping willow dead, the bottle brush, the southern flowers I planted, novelties to me, the northerner, dead, dead, all dead.

And on the branches of the dead magnolia the dead birds perch, swallow and nightingale, their dead eyes holding reflections of the flowers, genus and species, dead, sere, leaves cracked, dead all crawling things, all flying, speechless, dead, waiting and hollowed out with harrowing.

I lay my hand among these shadowings.
Because she always answered, I choose her, this mockingbird. I sing her my first word.
The rest is heaven, endlessness of grace, the skyline of the backyard limitless, my old broken eloquence of song aligned with certain resurrection's aftermath, this minute to be repeated and repeated repeated and repeated my bird sings.