

A poem for my sons when the day is too much or not enough by Jacob Stratman in the February 13, 2019 issue

Basket of Peaches, by Joseph Decker, 1885, oil on canvas

The checker at Walmart this morning thinks the winter weather's been bipolar.

Record highs one week, then lows in the 20s.
Our little maple started to bud in mid-February, she says. A hard freeze has made it sad now, she says. A local landscaper, a buddy of mine, I tell her, knows the trees are tough around here.

They'll be fine, he says. It's not like we're growing peaches anymore or nothin', I remind her and leave.

But it's hard considering an Arkansas summer without peaches, even spotted ones like Decker gives us, half-dumped, upset from a bucket—the kind, if we couldn't eat, we'd use for batting practice; the kind, not spotted and pocked by disease, the old ladies would turn into cobbler and the old men would mix with cranked ice cream; the kind that might entice an oriole or two to lounge on a fence post and maybe talk a bit about the fickleness of the coming spring weather.