Leaving the garden

by Christopher Warner in the October 9, 2019 issue

How were we able to drink up the sea?

—Nietzsche

Before the war, we sought out the shadows, and rested in their coolness; our thoughts only rarely wandered beyond our work, to the wind, stirring the fields at twilight. What is left? Fires burn on a thousand hills. We place ourselves like moths, stunned by flame, fluttering above the wrecked cathedrals; clawing at the shells of our own cocoons.