President Donald Trump, surrounded by schoolchildren of a variety of faiths, has announced what he called “historic steps to protect the First Amendment right to pray in the public schools.”

Within hours of senators being sworn in for Trump’s pending impeachment trial, the president and nine federal agencies on January 16 made moves they said would support the rights of religious people, including students who report their freedom to pray has been violated.

“In public schools around the country, authorities are stopping students and teachers from praying, sharing their faith or following their religious beliefs,” said Trump, sitting behind the Resolute desk of the Oval Office in an event carried online via C-SPAN. “It is totally unacceptable. You see it on the football field. You see it so many times where they’re stopped from praying, and we are doing something to stop that.”

Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, standing near Trump, said her department's new guidelines, which highlight "constitutionally protected prayer," require state agencies to inform it when complaints are filed about limitations to the free exercise of religion.

"Too many misinterpret a separation of church and state as an invitation for government to separate people from their faith," DeVos said. "In reality, our Constitution doesn't exist to protect us from religion; it exists to protect religion from government."

Daniel Mach, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Program on Freedom of Religion and Belief, said the Education Department's guidance about school prayer is very similar to language that has been in place since 2003 when issued by President George W. Bush.

"Importantly, both the Bush guidance and the copycat document released today affirm a core constitutional protection: school officials are prohibited from imposing their faith on students," Mach said. "The question, as always, is whether public-school officials will heed this warning. If they don't, we'll be there, as always, to correct them—and if necessary, we'll see them in court."

In addition to the announcement about school prayer, the administration said it had plans to remove the requirement that faith-based social service providers offer a secular alternative to people seeking their assistance.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State said such a rule would hurt many who receive services such as housing assistance, substance abuse treatment, and vocational training.

"These rules undermine the civil rights and religious freedom of millions of our most vulnerable Americans who rely on social services—with particularly dire consequences for LGBTQ people and religious minorities," said Rachel Laser, president and CEO of Americans United. "No one should be denied the help they need because their government-funded provider condemns who they are, who they love or what they believe."

Melissa Rogers, former head of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, likewise opposed the proposed changes that affect those who could be aided by religious social services.

“You can’t benefit from protections you don’t know you have,” she tweeted. “The religious liberty of social service beneficiaries is as important as the religious liberty of faith-based providers.”

The Trump administration’s new guidance and proposals, announced on Religious Freedom Day, aim to carry out aspects of the executive order that Trump signed into law in 2018 to establish the Faith and Opportunity Initiative, a revamping of previous faith-based initiatives under the Bush and Obama administrations. Paula White, who was recently named head of the initiative, stood alongside the children and cabinet representatives flanking Trump at the event.

Students gathered around the Oval Office desk shared stories of being told to hide when they wanted to pray during noninstructional time and being bullied for discussing their observance of the Jewish sabbath or wearing a hijab as a Muslim practice.

Johnnie Moore, who has served as an unofficial evangelical adviser to the Trump administration, was among conservative Christians welcoming the developments.

“The White House isn’t saying whether one should pray or to whom or what they should pray to, they are simply making it clear that in the United States students have First Amendment rights also, and our ‘separation of church and state’ wasn’t intended to suppress a vibrant religious life in America but to facilitate it,” he said in a statement. —Religion News Service
