Dear millennium, on quarantine dreams

by Karen An-Hwei Lee in the January 13, 2021 issue

As I wake in the morning, facing the risk of viral air wafting in open spaces such as the market, a gas station, or dog park, I dare to linger at the rows of fat peaches, in no haste to choose one with a gloved finger, a paper mask filtering the aroma of ripening fruit palmed in my right hand. The daily hours slow to the rate of dough rising in an oiled bowl, the floured wood petitioning silently for another round of dimpling and kneading, for sweet rolls instead of sourdough. Praying for loved ones at a distance by making bread, I sugar the yeast of kindred spirits with pleasure. In my dreams, the loaves of bread fly all over the globe like satellites radioing the old solace of toast, the fierce reassurance of butterflies winging south for winter in the mountains, their wings fiery and crisp as buttered rye, oblivious to the violence inflicted by an invisible coronavirus wreaking havoc on civilization, a virus so small, it is barely even a living thing.
