Beverly Shamana, pioneering Methodist bishop, dies at 81

by Sam Hodges in the September 8, 2021 issue

(Photo courtesy of the United Methodist Council of Bishops)

Beverly Shamana, the second Black woman to become a bishop in the United Methodist Church, died August 1. She was 81 and died of complications from Parkinson's disease, said Yvonne Williams Boyd, a California chaplain and close friend.

"Women bishops stand on the strength of her shoulders," said UMC Council of Bishops president Cynthia Fierro Harvey in a press release. "Her commitment to the episcopacy and for women bishops was paramount."

Shamana answered a call to ministry in the mid-1970s. She became an elder in the California-Pacific Conference in 1984.

Not long before her ordination, she changed her last name. She'd been Beverly Taylor, then was Beverly Anderson during a marriage that ended in divorce.

"I wanted a name that transcended time, space and ethnicity. I wanted a name that was universal," she told the Los Angeles Times in 2000, when she was elected bishop by the Western Jurisdictional Conference.

"I said, I don't want any name that has 'son,' 'him,' 'he' or 'man' anywhere in it," she told the newspaper. "I wanted a female name. Then I get this name—Shamana—that starts with shaMan and ends with MANa and has 'man' in the middle of it. God has a sense of humor, doesn't she?" —United Methodist News Service