Sonnet to knee scabs

by Shelby Poulin in the February 9, 2022 issue

Dark scab, ruby gem, dragon egg, scarab body, round and bulging—a current runs under the blood cage, pink flesh of cherubs. We are baby-skinned wielders with shotguns.

Porcelain warriors that kill for fun makes good TV, yet one rusty nail will slice a toe in real life, skin spread butterfly, sun will cook people to lobsters—skin is thin ice.

But the body craves old paradise. She speaks a maternal, native tongue that heals and binds, that crystalizes vice into a throbbing pact of blood, air, and lung.

Scabs are amputations, itching for the garden. Scabs are the body, stitching
