Eve asks the serpent for a story

by Lynn Domina in the February 9, 2022 issue

He began by telling her about rain, how some is soft, barely mist against her arm, how some days her hot skin will welcome its moisture but how other times it is fierce, frightening, loud as peacocks or elephants, how it rushes like owls, muddying rivers until you can't see trout or wide-mouth bass or painted turtles. He told her about a time when rain never stopped, when water swirled above the whole land. She could have seen, if she'd been there, ripples ring her knees, she could have felt her waist looped by flood. Sometimes, he said, frightening is another word for exciting. Then he described how raindrops linger on leaves or a grasshopper's wing or an apple's red skin, glimmering, the apple beautiful as ruby but still sweet, still plump with juice, still soft on her tongue. He was right, she knew, he was right, as soon as she took the fruit, bit into its ripe flesh.
