Fishes

by Jefferson Holdridge in the February 23, 2022 issue

A tissue paper wind sock of a fish Conjured this poem about fishes. A mold, or a handmade painted dish, Imagined a seascape of wishes.

So here is your poem of a fish Not of a fish, but about one. It vanishes Into the waves from the hellish Heat to a white-wine sauce, a sprig garnishes

The sea bass or the grouper, a knish On the side, or better, butter varnishes The fresh catch (this is becoming a niche Poem) and everyone relishes

The chance to partake, except the fish Who'd rather swim away. Delicious Or not, the poem is like the fish. It is no more than what embellishes

The fine palate, the mouthwatering wish.

The pond is empty but I think I heard a swish.
