

Early harvest

by Heather Kaufmann in the July 13, 2022 issue

Luke 6:27-36

I am eight years old, sitting on the back porch of my childhood home in late July a paper bag of unshucked corn at my feet.

Pausing before my task, I watch the maple oak and beech that wreath the yard shimmering in the gold of early evening light short legs swinging beneath my chair in time to the breeze that sings in nearby branches and warms my own bare skin with the tenderness of midsummer air.

There is so much that has been cursed (so much I try to bless) the earth gives its sweetness even still.

My small hands peel back husk and strand—the fine silk showering the ochre wood of the porch floor—to reveal within each ear a patchwork of pale yellow and creamy white.

I pile my handiwork on a tray to carry indoors where my mother drops them one by one into the boiling pot and together we watch them turn bright as beech trees in October.

Once cooked, we smear our choice of cob on a log of salted butter, tracing dimpled grooves in the softened yellow before lifting it to our lips to whittle row upon row of untidy ruts, each bite a burst of juice, so sweet—this early gleaning, this taste of a harvest yet to come.