John After Delacroix

reviewed by Lois Huey-Heck in the September 19, 2012 issue

In the foreground of Eugène Delacroix's classic The Entombment of Christ is a poignant image of the disciple John sitting, bent forward, contemplating the crown of thorns. By painting John and the crown alone, Ebenezer Sunder Singh shines a spotlight on this pregnant moment, offering a chance to ponder the wisdom of God which seems like folly to human beings. "The image of the thorn crown is a recurring phenomenon in my works over many years," says the artist. "I use it as a compulsive pictorial symbol, and at the same time I revere it as the symbol of pain, shame and hope. I think John in Delacroix's painting knows this secret, so he is contemplating this symbol of recreation and regeneration." Singh's work is shown frequently in galleries in the U.S. and India.