On grace in late August

She uses the dishwasher only to dry what she washes in the sink. She looks out across the dry-brown backyard, grass probably crinkly under foot, like walking on potato chips in the carpeted den, just to notice her son's square garden, framed by railroad tie fragments housing rot and yellow jackets, with its single jalapeño or spotted Beefsteak hanging heavily, waiting for him to free them from the heat, from the deer. No one's around her now, anywhere near the kitchen, the sun high, a spotlight, inviting her gaze on the garden. It will be years before he confesses his sins at the counter, to be absolved, just in front of this sink where she promises to wash peppers and tomatoes that tend to die on the vine on this heat-drenched square patch of garden in the back, still in view, stilled as she hums hymns and waits for dishes to dry.
