November Rose in Pittsburgh

by Sally Witt, CSJ in the November 2022 issue

In the tiny front yard at the house of a neighbor dead three years, flowers are left uncared for.

Yet they have been faithful to their yearly blooming. White iris, pink azalea, yellow rose have taken steadfast turns each spring and summer.

Today, in late November, I pause to see a rose in bloom.

It whispers someone loved the soil here, once cared for roots and stems so thoroughly they persist even in neglect, while temperatures, having lost their ties to seasons, cannot enforce the time a rose must rest or stay its blooming.
